At a session of the Central Directorate of the Society for German-Soviet Friendship held in East Berlin in Early April 1955, Friedrich Ebert, president of the Society and member of the SED Politbüro, gave the main speech. He stated that the members of the Society, as well as those of the other mass organizations, would have to become much more active in the future. He complained that it was a scandal that an organization with a membership of approximately three million, such as the Society for German-Soviet Friendship, should do as little as it had in the past. He stated that members of mass organizations should prepare to carry out concrete personal assignments similar to the direct assignments given to SED members. Such assignments would be given them in the near future.¹

1. Comment. Ebert had just returned from a vacation in the USSR, and it is assumed that he brought back new directives from Moscow for the intensification of mass organization activity.
